What is honey-soufflé?

THE TECHNOLOGY BEHIND HONEY SOUFFLE

This product, which captured the hearts of European honey connoisseurs some time ago, is new to the Russian market, yet has already proven very popular there.

The technology for producing honey soufflé was invented in Canada back in 1928 by I. J. Dyson, a professor of beekeeping. As part of this process, honey is mixed for an extended period using a special technique. It is then kept at low temperatures to ensure its delicate consistency. What's more, the honey's beneficial properties are preserved as the temperature is strictly controlled.

Peroni's innovation was to add dried fruits, berries, nuts and even spices to the honey to transform this traditional product into an innovative and sensational treat. Peroni works with the very best chefs in Russia to constantly improve the range of flavours and make the product even more appealing.

How are berries and fruits dried?

Berries and fruits are dried by means of freeze drying. This technique, also known as lyophilization, is extremely gentle; the products are firstly frozen and then placed in a vacuum where the moisture is extracted. Since the products are not exposed to high temperatures, their maximum taste, aroma and colour are preserved.
